The companies of Isidro Benso Alarcón Gálvez, Jaime Elorza Barragán, . The Medellín Project was an urban planning and a multi-phase project. It aimed to cover the entire area of the city of Medellín, Colombia, to rebuild and repair existing infrastructure, transform major urban areas into sustainable communities and improve the housing and education in the city. This multi-phase project started in 1993 and ended in 2015. The plan took over 16 years and was developed by a group of architects and urban planners who are known as El Grupo de Medellín, among them are Arquitectos Recoleta (AR), Arquitectura Hispanoamericana (AH), and Arquitectos Castro Cantón (AC). The project plans for the revitalization of the city center and the construction of a new government complex, a cultural center, new universities and public buildings. The original project was highly controversial, with members of the public fighting for the redistribution of the land. In November 1999, the Colombian government approved the Medellín law, which supported the project and allocated the necessary funding. Through the Medellín Project, more than 7.2 million people were moved in the city, the urban and agricultural areas of the metropolitan area were redistributed, and 1,547 hectares of land were dedicated to parks and new neighborhoods.[1] .
