Cummins Insite 7.x keygen.After a federal judge ordered the White House to allow the media access to a draft copy of the president's speech to the United Nations General Assembly in New York in September, the presidential counsel's office was rebuffed by the White House, according to an internal administration email. "Unfortunately, the Justice Department ruled that the speech will not be released under the Freedom of Information Act because it is the president's 'personal' speech," wrote David S. Kris, the acting assistant attorney general for national security. Kris's email, dated July 26, 2012, is part of a trove of documents released on Tuesday by the National Security Archive, a nonprofit think tank that releases government documents that are otherwise secret. The July 25 document dump, which had been subject to a court order, includes 13,000 pages of materials from the Office of Legal Counsel, which includes the Justice Department's legal experts. This is the first time that the documents have been available to the public for review. The White House was not available for comment for this article, but in a statement issued after the document dump, White House deputy press secretary Eric Schultz said that the administration had been "fully cooperative" with the court order and allowed "the government to disclose previously withheld documents to the public," including the speech. He said the administration had been "respectful" of the court order and said that it "cannot disclose the speech for the reasons previously stated." The White House's position was first enunciated by then-White House counsel Kathryn Ruemmler in a memo to staff written two weeks before the speech. "The President has made the decision not to release the speech," Ruemmler wrote. "As such, the staff cannot determine at this time what the policy or practice will be regarding access to the speech once he has delivered it." "However," she added, "no final determination has been made and, therefore, it is possible that future requests for the speech will be approved." The speech was delivered by Obama in front of the General Assembly on September 19, 2012. Kris's email appears to have been written in response to the Justice Department's ruling, in which, according to the
